OUTWITTED BY A CLERGYMAN.

How a Methodist Minister Got Into the War Department Ahead of His Turn.

A prominent Methodist clergyman in this city fell into a reminiscent mood one evening and gave a party of friends an entertaining account of the way in which he succeeded in obtaining an interview with the secretary of war in the days of the rebellion.

Visitors to Washington who have experienced the annoyances and delays generally encountered in reaching the inner office of a member of the cabinet in these trying times of peace can imagine what such an attempt meant in war times, when every cabinet officer, and particularly the secretary of war, was overwhelmed with work seven days in the week.

"It was a matter of the most pressing necessity," said the clergyman, "for me to go to the front of the Union lines without an hour's delay. I reached Washington in the morning and soon learned that I could not cross the Potomac into Virginia without a pass from the secretary of war.

"Thinking it would be no trouble to get the pass, I inquired where the war department was and hurried up to Seventeenth street, where it was then located. About Sixteenth street I noticed a line of men on the sidewalk, and as I hurried along I found that this line extended up Pennaylania avenue, around the corner of Seventeenth street, and down the block to the entrance to the war department.

"Men in the line told me they were waiting their turn to see Secretary Stanton, and some of those near the head of the line told me that I must take my place at the tail of that long line, and perhaps I would reach the department the next day.

"That would never do for me, and as I walked slowly down the line I put on my 'thinking cap' and thought out a scheme to get into the secretary's office without any delay. Before I got to the end of that line I had formed a plan of procedure.

"I hurried down the avenue until I found a stationery store, where I bought a package of foolscap paper and a couple of large, official looking envelopes. Folding up several sheets of the blank paper, I filled each of the envelopes with them, and sealed up the envelopes and borrowed the stationer's pen long enough to address each to the Honorable Secretary of War, Washington, D. C., in big, black letters.

"Then, with these envelopes in my hand, I went up to the war department.
As soon as I was in sight of the two soldiers who stood on guard at the door I put on the most important air I could assume and walked so fast it was just short of a run.

"As I reached the entrance the soldiers dropped and crossed their muskets in front of me, just as I had expected them to do, but I saved the big envelopes at them and cried out: 'Important! Important!' and they stepped aside just as I had hoped they would.

"Once inside the building it was an easy matter to find the secretary's office. I told Mr. Stanton frankly how I had got into the place, and he laughed heartily as he made out the papers, it was so important I should have." - New York Herald.
